Anger Management Online

Anger course work has become a staple in our societies response to violent or criminal behavior. The courts recognize the potential of these programs, even making participation in these courses mandatory for many defendants. It is also in place for individuals who recognize their need to get help for anger issues, either on their own or through their employer.

Our program was designed by the National Anger Management Association (NAMA) and is administered by Licensed Social workers (PA) who are also members of the National Association of Social Workers (NASW). To meet the high standards of both organizations, the online anger management course is made up of twelve sessions modules which can be completed in approximately eight weeks. The modules are self directed with instructor led sessions being run multiple times a week. we are able to offer flexible scheduling, small class size, and allow the student to attend several sessions a week. Learners can progress through multiple modules each week enabling them to complete the course in less time.

Our Social Workers engage the learner throughout the course. The interactive sessions allow the student's name to remain confidential while encouraging their participation. The self directed modules are highly interactive and easy to navigate.

Every day anger leads to the death of loved ones.

Online Learning

Today online learning has become main stream, and with good reason. Studies have found increases in participation and attendance among those enrolled in an instructor led online course. Also, The anonymity provide by the online instruction leads to increased levels of class participation and to a more open environment for participant discussion. Many professions use online learning methods for their members to earn continuing education credits This includes teachers, nurses, and social workers. Further, most institutions of higher learning offer online curriculum.

Traditional Anger Management

The traditional method of Anger Management uses a group format in a classroom setting. These programs run from eight to ten weeks in length and are often run by individuals with limited training. Participants often want to remain anonymous and there is little incentive for participation. Now consider the impact on participants in an anger management program, where some participants are involuntary clients. Sadly, individuals earn the certificate for mere attendance with little in the way of testing or evaluation. While well intentioned these programs often result in certificate mills.

Less compressive programs exist which offer a home based course with little interaction with a trained professional. The learner completes a workbook or reads online, then submits material back for a certificate. These types of programs appear to be an expensive version of the certificate mill.
